Not illustrated. 1838 Excerpt: .- me, and quoted something from Moliere, about his being the better fitted to guide my youth. I presume he is a man of fortune, Emilie? Oh yes, indeed--that is the worst of it; if it were not for that, I could do as I please. Gertrude's heart was full of sympathy, tenderness, and compassion for the unresisting victim, but she hesitated to express her feelings.-- Why should she increase the reluctance that must be unavailing? Were it not better to employ her influence over Emilie, to reconcile her to the now inevitable event. She tried to look at the affair in the most favourable point of view, and as there are few substances so black that they will not reflect some light, so there are few circumstances in life but that have, as the proser say, their advantages as well as disadvantages, -- I should ever have carved out for you a different fate, dear Emilie, she said-- to love, as well as to be loved, is always our young dream. Yes, indeed! and is it not hard to awake so soon from it? Yes; but it might prove an illusion, and you awake to some blessed realities. You might cease to love, but you can never lose the happiness that springs from a difficult sacrifice to filial sentiment. That is true, Gertrude, and I will make the most of it. Momma would have been so wretched--she has so much feeling. Gertrude recollected the Utica scrawl,...
