Cuvier s Odontographie des Mammiferes, Giebel s Odontographie, Owen s Odontography are examples of more or less comprehensive treatises in the pre-evolutionary spirit. They antedate the discovery of what may be called the new odontography, which is based upon the unity of dental type, upon the evolution of the teeth of mammals from a common reptilian prototype, and which treats of each form in relation to its origin, its descent, its gradual complication, and the laws of analogous evolution or independent production of similar forms. The new odontography centres around the tritubercular theory of Cope. This theory had wider acceptance ten years ago than it has to-day; there has been a strong reaction against certain features of it on the part of many of the most able anatomists. This is partly due to misunderstanding, partly to the fact that all the evidence has never been fully marshalled, partly to the discovery of new embryological and palaeontological evidence which may disprove certain features of the theory; but chiefly to the fact that some of the most decisive and convincing palaeontological evidence in support of the theory has not been clearly advanced. It is hoped that this collection of the contributions of the writer, with additional observations, illustrations, and data, and with a discussion of various other theories and criticisms will serve to convince...
