Excerpt: . . . matching rates by 6 and 8 percentage points, respectively. In all four specifications, the probability of matching is generally increasing with the ability level measured as degree attainment rather than showing the bell-shaped relationship. This supports the hypothesis that matching is a preferred option for employment and proves that the voluntary withdrawals from matching because trainees prefer non-match jobs are not a significant portion of matching failure. Some might argue that training completion is a better indicator of training success. However, the endogeneity of training completion prevents us from achieving meaningful information about selection into matching. Whether a trainee withdraws from training program because he she considers a match as undesirable (high-ability trainees) or unattainable (low-ability trainees), early withdrawal is highly correlated with matching failure. For this reason, I use training completion as a control variable rather than a proxy for training success. In all specifications, completion of training is very significant....
